La homicide today.  Homicide report la times.

As of August 11, 2015, the Homicide Report's map has undergone changes in its appearance and functionality. These updates were made based on reader feedback and are part of a series of improvements aimed at enhancing the site. The first notable change is the replacement of "clusters" with orange markers for each incident. This new feature provides a more accurate representation of where killings occur in Los Angeles County. The database contains over 14,000 homicides dating back to 2000, and when filtering by all years, the map may become sluggish due to the large number of points. Upon filtering by categories such as age or race, homicides that do not fall within the selected filters will remain on the map as small gray dots. This new display offers greater context, particularly when zoomed in, allowing users to see nearby homicides regardless of neighborhood or other filters. A full-screen version of the map is now accessible through a button in the top left corner of the map, below the zoom functions. Some redundant features have been removed to slim down the site and improve its overall usability. Additionally, the coloring of neighborhoods based on the "L.A. Times Homicide Rank" has been eliminated as it was deemed less effective than the new orange markers at showing densities of homicides. The data is still being maintained, but alternative ways to access it are being explored. Women in L.A. County are facing dire consequences due to domestic violence, with nearly 5 million residents living in an area with a mere 2,000 emergency shelter beds. According to Eve Sheedy, executive director of the county's Domestic Violence Council, the demand for services has surpassed capacity, with Rainbow Services turning away 900 requests last year. Meanwhile, organizations like Peace Over Violence have had to add staff due to a growing wait list for crisis intervention and prevention services. The Jenesse Center reported a 400-person increase in demand for services in 2018 compared to the previous year. Experts note that pinpointing the exact reasons behind rising female fatalities is challenging, as violence often stems from complex social, psychological, and economic factors. Many victims may not recognize the danger they're facing or be too afraid to take action due to financial risks or concerns about their children. Friends and family may be unaware of available services such as shelters, counselors, and confidential hotlines. As Patti Giggans, executive director of Peace Over Violence, notes, "It happens in the shadows; it happens in the home." Last year's toll was the highest since 2010, with a total of 1,948 women killed by men nationwide, according to a recent report. The number has been steadily rising since 2014 and is also on the rise nationally. The study highlights that while some homicides may follow after many warning signs, others do not. The case of Yanet Palma-Perez, who was attacked with a hatchet in her home and left for dead, serves as a tragic reminder of the devastating consequences of domestic violence. her murder. The children of her sister Ena Palma are now being raised by her after their mother’s death at their hands. “They lost not just one but two people that day,” Palma said. Los Angeles Police Det Connie Zych described Cruz as a controlling figure with no prior signs of violence, stating it was a typical domestic abuse case where the victim snapped. Many victims don’t report abuse due to embarrassment. Claudia Gonzalez distanced herself from loved ones after dating Larry Sierra but confessed to a friend about his threats when she became pregnant with her third child. When Gonzalez tried to visit her son and was rebuffed by Sierra, she was shot by a stranger in Florence. Abusers often feel powerlessness when their partner leaves them. Charmine Davis, director of behavioral health at the Jenesse Center, said abusers can be very angry and afraid. To address this issue, law enforcement has increased resources for handling domestic violence cases and partnered with mental health services. The Violence Against Women Act provides funding for prosecuting crimes against women but is up for reauthorization this year with added protections for college students and immigrants. The bill aims to prohibit convicted abusers from buying or owning guns, a move that some call the “boyfriend loophole”. Who would deny her the chance to reunite with loved ones, her sister lamented. Lopez would send gifts and flowers, but promises of a better future were short-lived. The abuse continued unabated. Lopez is now serving a life sentence for her murder. "It's heartbreaking and senseless that she had to endure such trauma," said Johnson, her sister. "The brutality was devastating."
